JUST PLAIN BUNNY

ONCE upon a time there was a bunny rabbit named Bunny. The reason he was named just plain Bunny was this: his mother had so many older children that by the time she got to Bunny she had run out of names! She couldn't think of another one! So she called him just plain Bunny.

Bunny Rabbit felt kind of lost in his big huge family. It seemed to him that nobody ever paid any attention to him. One day, for instance, he found a robin's egg. Bunny thought it was terribly wonderful to find such a rare and pretty thing as a robin's egg. He hopped home just as fast as he could, holding his treasure carefully in his paw. But when he got home, all his many brothers and sisters were talking so loudly he could hardly get a word in. Finally he yelled, "Look what I found!"

But nobody seemed to hear, so he yelled even louder, "Look what I found!"

Still no one paid attention. He screamed at the top of his lungs, "LOOK WHAT I FOUND!"

This time his brother Roger glanced at him and said, "Well, what did you find?"

Bunny Rabbit opened his mouth to say, "A robin's—" but immediately his sister Rachel started squealing, "Mommy, Rosemary pulled my ear!" and his brother Ronnie shouted, "Anyone for baseball?" and his father began howling at everyone else to keep their voices down so he could hear The Rabbit League's final game on the radio.

"I'll run away," said Bunny to himself. "I'll find somebody who's interested in looking at my robin's egg."

A little while later Bunny Rabbit was hopping through the woods when he came to a little old lady squirrel sitting sadly in the doorway of her tree-trunk house. She looked very lonesome. "Would you like," asked Bunny, "for me to stay and be your little son?"

"Yes indeedy," cackled the old squirrel, swishing her fluffy grey tail out of the way so that Bunny could sit down.

Bunny waited to see what it would feel like to be the only child in a family, for a change. He had expected it to feel fine. For one thing, he could talk to his heart's content, and no one would interrupt. "Look what I found," he said.

He held out his robin's egg to the squirrel, but all she answered was "What's that?"

"Oh . . . nothin' . . ." Bunny mumbled. What fun was it to show things to someone who didn't care about things? His mommy cared about robin's eggs. So did his brothers and sisters. He felt himself starting to get homesick. But he stayed on, talking and talking, while the squirrel listened and nodded. At last it was suppertime. The squirrel gave him a moldy acorn.

"No lettuce?" asked Bunny.

She shook her head. Hungrily, that night he lay down to sleep. He missed his mother's goodnight kiss, and his father's, and he wished he could hear all his brothers and sisters singing themselves happily to sleep like they did at home. In the morning the squirrel handed him his breakfast. Another acorn!

"No carrots?" he asked.

She shook her head. Then Bunny said, "I'm going home," and that's just what he did. When he got there all his sisters and brothers were crying. So were his mom and dad.

"What's the matter?" Bunny asked.

At the sound of his voice they all looked up and saw him. Then they rushed at him, hugging and kissing. Bunny was so surrounded he could scarcely breathe. At last he got free and heard his mother say, "Oh we were so worried about you, Bunny."

"We missed you, Bunny," all his sisters and brothers said.

"I missed you too," he smiled, "and look what I have!"

"A ROBIN'S EGG!" everyone shouted. "HOW WONDERFUL!"
